Hearing Aids Stimulate Brain Activity

Hearing aids do more than just help you hear. Hearing aids also help your brain stay fit and active.

Several scientific studies have found that hearing aids keep the brain fit and may protect against cognitive decline. For example, people who wear hearing aids maintain better brain function over time than those who do not.

The Brain Forgets Sounds Affecting Cognition

Untreated hearing loss affects your hearing and your quality of life, it also affects the brain's ability to remember everyday sounds. The brain 'forgets' the sounds over time and becomes unable to understand these sounds. Untreated hearing loss also affects cognition and may result in cognitive decline and even earlier onset dementia.

Treat Your Hearing Loss

It is important for your brain to have your hearing tested and start using hearing aids if needed. Once you start using hearing aids, the hearing processing resumes, supplying signals to the brain keeps your auditory cortex stimulated. Your hearing will improve keeping your brain fit and active. But the longer you wait, the more difficult it is to be able to understand speech clearly again and activate the parts in the brain that pick up and process sounds.
